

Interpersonal skill is the ability to work with others. This self-assessment will see how successful your relationship is with other people at home, school, at work, and in a social situation. This assessment will help you get a feel for and develop your interpersonal skills. It will also help you to recognize areas in need of improvement.

There are four categories listening skills, verbal or expressive communication, emotional intelligence, and working in groups or on a team. It is critical that when you take the test you answer honestly, thinking about your current situation, not what you want it to look like in the future. Consider the range of interpersonal skills you have given any social situation.